The Incredible Orangutan

Deep in the forests of Borneo and Sumatra, a bright orange animal lives high up in the trees. The orangutan is a unique primate, which means it is related to chimps, gorillas, and even human beings. Unlike most primates, however, orangutans spend their lives almost entirely in the trees. They are able to do this with specialized hands and feet that allow them to grip trees and branches, and their long arms allow them to reach out and grab distant branches. They stay in the trees to avoid predators, such as clouded leopards, tigers, and wild dogs.

GENETIC DRIFT

Genetic drift provides random changes in the occurrence of genes through chance events. These chance events can take place when a few individuals of a population break off from the original group and start their own population, also known as the founder effect. This is what happened with Darwin's finches. A few birds might have been blown to the Galapagos Islands during a storm. These "founder" birds remained on the island and reproduced, eventually developing into different species.

Bottlenecking

Genetic drift can also occur if a large number of the population is killed because of disease, starvation, change in natural environment or a natural disaster. When this happens to a population, it is called bottlenecking. A large population is reduced to a few individuals, and the genes of subsequent generations become very similar. Inbreeding between these few individuals leads to populations that have very few genetic differences. This situation happens with many endangered species. An example is the Florida panther (Puma concolor coryi). Many panthers were killed by human hunters or died because of habitat loss. This has created a modern bottleneck. This bottleneck is suspected to be the reason why many Florida panthers have breeding problems.
